Women and Sport

attitudes? In the nineteenth century in Britain, sport was not considered a suitable pastime for a woman. It was associated with male physical strength and intense competition, whereas women were expected to be much gentler and less energetic. Middle-class women were, however, spectators at events like horse racing and cricket matches, and they did play slow games of tennis, badminton and croquet. If they played with men, the men were careful not to hit the ball too hard and to give the ladies every possible advantage. Richer women had the opportunity to take up sporting hobbies such as riding and hunting, as long as they behaved in a feminine manner. As women's clothes became looser and lighter towards the end of the century, cycling became popular with women of all social classes. Special sportswear was designed for other games; it carefully hit the body's real shape so that women would remain respectable.

With the new century, many more women participated in a much wider range of sports - cricket, golf, hockey, and swimming, among others. On the whole, though, they played separately from men. And it is still true that mixed sports are common at the social level but not in competitions. Many women favor the development of mixed participation and believe that in many sports women could compete successfully with men if they had the same opportunities and training.
